

Mental health impacts of coronavirus (COVID-19)

It's normal to feel stress and worry when there is a health event happening in the community that is affecting people's wellbeing, such as COVID-19.

This can affect anyone in the community who is worried about the virus, with more specific concerns for people being tested, people in self-isolation or quarantine and people who have tested positive for COVID-19.

Family and friends can also experience similar impacts to their mental health and wellbeing.

Potential mental health impacts are:

- > increased anxiety or concern for self and others (this can be expressed as a fear for one's own health, and a fear of infecting others)
- > feeling lonely, disconnected and/or socially isolated
- > feeling a range of different emotions, such as increased stress, sadness, frustration, or hopelessness
- > feeling like (or experiencing) people viewing you in a negative way because of the situation
- > experiencing changes to work, study or care-giving responsibilities
- > impact to normal daily routine.

Isolation can be particularly challenging, below are some home practices to look after your mental health and wellbeing:

- > Maintain a daily routine as much as possible, including your normal sleep routine.
- > Stay connected with family and friends through technology e.g. Skype, Facetime and other technology can be helpful.
- > Look after your physical health through regular healthy meals.
- > Don't over-indulge in alcohol or comfort foods.
- > Be aware of overexposure to news sources or social media. Keeping informed can be helpful, but repeated bulletins about COVID-19 may be overwhelming.
- > Be aware that your mood or feelings may change, including periods of sadness, anxiety, frustration, uncertainty or fear. If these symptoms are overwhelming and are not going away, seek help.
- > As much as possible, continue doing activities at home that you enjoy.
- > Access internet or phone based support if you need.
